Adoption Story: A Cat Nap Cure

By Kay Lockett

Shadow is a black cat, 13 years old, with big orange eyes that look into my soul. It took her a while to adopt me after I brought her home from Miss Kitty's. At first, she sequestered herself in a dark corner. I couldn't find her, and the only sign of life was an empty food bowl in the morning. After a few weeks, I found a clue: two tufts of black hair outside the laundry room. I finally discovered her hiding place, those orange eyes peeking out from the deepest corner of the house.

During this time, I called Miss Kitty's every day. One of the adoption crew, texted and reassured me to be patient. Ok, I wasn't—but I took it one day at a time.

Suddenly, Shadow became my rightful owner, claiming her side of the bed, complete with her baby blanket, catnip, and toys. Even at 13, she acts like a kitten, playing with feathers and her cat tunnel. One night at 3:00am, she howled like a giant feline despite weighing just six pounds. I was adopted at last! As Kristin Cast says: "Cats choose us; we don't own them."

Now, she's a loving, playful kitten who purrs on my lap during naps and goes to bed with me at 9:00pm—except for her early morning wake-ups at 4:00am. After dry food and a nap on my tummy, she's off for more rest while I start my day. Shadow, of course, sleeps much later.

At nearly 80 years old, I've learned to accept the routine and protect my own sanity—by cat napping every day, just like Shadow. Meooooooooow.
